The problem of Longitude was the most vexing navigational challenge of the European Age of Discovery. Thousands of sailors lost their lives at sea due to inadequate knowledge of their position. In 1714, English Parliament established a prize worth millions of US dollars in today's currency for a solution to the longitude problem and in effect, set up a historic contest between some of the greatest astronomers and mechanical minds of Europe.